SUMMARY

The state of Sino-Soviet competition in Asia remained relatively unchanged during the latter half of 1979. Because neither side experienced dramatic gains or losses during this time, the general configuration of relations that evolved earlier between these two superpowers and the nations of Japan, Vietnam, and North and South Korea was maintained with little variation. Nevertheless, there was perceptible movement in some instances as loyalties changed direction by degree and situations of tension either eased or intensified.

The most appreciable shift occurred as Japan sought to improve its relations with China at the same time its relations with the Soviet Union were becoming increasingly strained. A state visit to China in December by Japanese Prime Minister Ohira climaxed several months of heightened diplomatic and economic exchange between the two countries and resulted in Japan granting substantial loans for Chinese development projects as well as entering into an agreement with China to develop oil resources jointly in Bohai Bay. Failure to resolve a territorial dispute involving opposing claims to the Senkaku Islands, however, precluded the conclusion of additional agreements directed at joint development of oil resources in sea areas surrounding these islands. Still, relations remained at a high as the two nations mutually exchanged trade offices and Japan granted China preferential tariff status to begin in April 1980.

Japan's resolve to improve its relations with the Soviet Union in 1979 was weakened, however, by apparent Soviet intentions to continue reinforcing an already substantial military presence on northern territorial islands historically claimed by Japan. Japan's sensitivity to the territorial issue involved was further aggravated by adamant Soviet refusals to accept Japanese protests on the frail premise that a territorial dispute did not exist and protests were, therefore, an unwarranted interference in Soviet internal affairs. Hopes that a long-awaited summit between the Communist Parties of Japan and the Soviet Union would settle the dispute, as a part of their discussions to normalize relations, were left unfulfilled as the summit's final communique indicated the issue was only perfunctorily addressed. However, Japan's dissatisfaction with Soviet behavior was presented with an opportunity for expression as the year drew to a close: the Japanese Government issued a severe condemnation of the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. Of particular interest to note is that a year earlier Japan had pains-takingly refrained from taking a similarly strong stand against the Chinese invasion of Vietnam.

As opposed to Japan's discernible shifting from one position to another with respect to China and the Soviet Union, Vietnam's position between the two powers continued to be relatively fixed. The conclusion of the first year of the Vietnam-USSR Treaty of Friendship and Cooperation in November witnessed Vietnam's already heavy dependence on the Soviet Union become even greater as Hanoi's need for military hardware to sustain its operations in Kampuchea forced it even deeper into Moscow's debt. At the same time, Vietnam's relations with China continued to be dominated by the threat of a second invasion. Antagonism between the two nations continued unabated as each side accused the other of initiating military skirmishes along their common border. Negotiations commenced earlier in the year continued to be stalemate as each side assumed a fundamentally uncompromising stance. The Chinese maintained that Vietnam, as a prelude to constructive negotiations, should remove its military forces from Kampuchea, while Vietnam, refusing to discuss Kampuchea, argued that it was an extraneous issue, involving a third country having no direct bearing on the differences being negotiated between Vietnam and China. Apart from the talks, however, Vietnam suffered a major diplomatic loss of face to China when one of its most senior Politburo members, Hoang Van Hoan, defected to the Chinese side in July.

For both China and the Soviet Union, relations with North and South Korea remained relatively stable. The Democratic People's Republic of Korea maintained carefully balanced relations with both China and the Soviet Union while the Republic of Korea edged almost imperceptibly toward the Soviets rather than the Chinese. Trade statistics for 1978 published by Seoul in 1979 indicated the volume of ROK trade with the Soviet Union was many times that with the PRC, and there is no reason to believe that the ratio for 1979 is any different. Similarly, Soviet-initiated gestures, such as granting visas to South Korean political scientists to attend an international academic meeting on world politics held in the Soviet Union and inviting a ROK delegation to attend an International Social Security Association meeting in Tashkent, served in small ways to ease relations between the two countries. Gestures of an equivalent nature were not, however, forthcoming from the Chinese.

The latter months of 1979 most significantly demonstrated China's fear of Soviet military expansion in Asia, whether by the USSR's overt construction of military bases on disputed territorial islands north of Japan or by anticipated Soviet military support for Vietnamese expansion into Thailand. In December, during Japanese Prime Minister Ohira's visit to China, the Chinese expressed a strong interest in seeing Japan strengthen its Self-Defense Forces as a response to Soviet military expansion in the northern territories. At the same time, Chinese Vice Premier Deng Xiaoping told Japanese Foreign Minister Okita that China would administer a "second lesson" to Vietnam if Vietnamese forces moved into Thailand. A Chinese military delegation visiting Thailand confirmed Deng's threat by assuring ASEAN members that China would take their side should the Vietnamese war in Kampuchea spill into Thailand.
